The trail begins with a series of switchbacks, quickly climbing past sword fern and salal before leveling out a few hundred feet above the river in a section of old-growth firs. From here the trail becomes tame, with only minor elevation changes and small creeks to tiptoe across. We will get to the five mile mark and turn around at a viewpoint at a bend in the river. This popular hike has some of the best of the Olympics flora and fauna and is well worth a visit. The hike is approachable for hikers of every skill level, and while the initial 300 foot hurdle might be a challenging for some youngsters, most of the route is a decent trek for kids. Be on the lookout for a great photo opportunity at a sharp switchback about 1.3 miles in, where Talapus Creek foams into a ravine just off the trail. Upon arrival at Talapus, we can break out lunch or press on to Olallie Lake about a mile and a half up trail, where open campsites offer lakeside havens with calm waters and views of a beautiful lake basin.
